SCHOOL OF ARCHITECTURE
HEALTH CARE DESIGN / ASSOCIATE PROFESSOR OR PROFESSOR

The School of Architecture announces an available position with duties beginning August 2006.

Associate Professor or Professor of Graduate Studies in Architecture + Health:

This is a tenure-track or tenured position for teaching and research within Clemson’s distinctive Architecture + Health curriculum. The A+H program focuses broadly on relationships between architecture and human health at many levels and specifically on the design of healthcare settings. The curriculum engages the study of these relationships at a range of scales and settings including: community and urban design, landscape and site design, the design of health facilities and other building types, and the design of spaces and architectural elements within these settings.

Candidates should have a Ph.D., as they will be expected to engage in sponsored research, play a role in a new interdisciplinary Ph.D. program within the College and contribute to a proposed Center for Health and the Built Environment. Candidates should also have experience in architectural practice related to health facility design and/or applied architectural research related to health and architectural settings. Architectural registration is desirable. Candidates should be qualified to teach graduate architecture studios and/or seminar courses within the Architecture + Health Curriculum. In addition to teaching and research, applicants will be expected to participate in professional, department, college, and university service. Appointment rank and tenure status will be based on qualifications, experience and current academic standing of the candidate.

Candidates are encouraged to apply who have demonstrated a dedication to architecture, teaching and research as well as a broad interest in working across disciplines to take advantage of our position within the College of Architecture, Arts & Humanities. Although this position will be based on the main campus, candidates will be encouraged to engage our off-campus and interdisciplinary programs.

Initial screening will be based upon a curriculum vita, a letter of interest presenting teaching, research/scholarship, and service objectives, names and contact information of three references, and examples of professional or scholarly work (five pages maximum). Application reviews will begin January 06, 2006.
